Every single action in the game - whether it is a pass, a dribble, a corner or a shot - is influenced by this data. The more movement data available, the more precise and intelligent the control will be. The motion capture suits, which are used to collect the data, have saved nearly a year of development time and ensured that player control in the game remains faithful to the real-life sport. Every day of gameplay will require you to make decisions regarding how to control your player. The more data collected, the more information available to make the correct decisions. As data is increased, so will the precision of gameplay. You can enable/disable it during gameplay, and even allow your opponents to measure the amount of data available. There is a story mode with loads of replays which will be enhanced to show how the game has been influenced by the collected data. In addition, HyperMotion technology will be used to collect data, for the first time in an official FIFA game, to be used in the upcoming FIFA Ultimate Team mode. Sony Interactive Entertainment Worldwide Studios President Shuhei Yoshida said: "FIFA 20 helped define the bar for what a FIFA game could be, with the excellent gameplay and fun we created for fans. We believe the time is right to raise the bar again and introduce the pinnacle of what a FIFA game should be, with 'FIFA 22'. The collective action of millions of fans watching an official FIFA World Cup final is a magic moment which can only be captured with motion capture. We are thrilled that the magic will be captured in 'FIFA 22' and we are confident it will be a seminal moment for video games." Peter Moore, Chief Operating Officer, Electronic Arts, added: "At EA we are unapologetically passionate about finding new ways to innovate the sports gaming genre. 'FIFA 22' is the culmination of our decade of trying to take video game technology to the next level - and there are some incredible developments in the engine and physics of this game that really expand on what has been possible before. It's also the culmination of my time at FIFA, and it has been my goal to build the best game possible."
